Skeletons From The Grave Reveal Neanderthal's Stone Age Diet A fossilized pelvis discovered at the site of a Neanderthal burial in the Pleistocene era is helping to illuminate their diet for the first time. In a study published in Science, researchers analyzed the size, shape, and teeth of the fossil's pelvis and concluded that its owner ate meat, berries, and nuts. This ancient skeleton was found at a cave in the Neander Valley of western Germany. The skeleton, discovered in the late 1980s, was found partially buried in a shallow grave, under a layer of ash and stones, and dated to about 33,000 years ago. The new analysis of the pelvic bone reveals the remains belonged to a young adult male of about 20 to 30 years old. And while the bones haven't been tested for DNA, they share a number of traits with modern humans. However, the pelvis of this Neanderthal doesn't have humanlike knee, hip, and ankle joints. This is because the species lived in a warm, coastal environment. Instead of a humanlike pelvis, this man 82157476af
